From the (Phil.) REGISTER.

TEMPER, SPIRIT, AND RESOURCES OF OUR COUNTRY.

FAR from wishing to excite the angry passions of the nation, or to prompt the spirit of war, our general sense of public interest would lead to the inculcation of an opposite temper, and to the cultivation of the arts of peace, with which the prosperity of every people is inseparably connected. But there are limits to forbearance, beyond which we are bound, by the highest obligations of honor and safety, not to endure either insult or injury from whatever quarter they come. And hence the right which as Americans, we shall invariably exercise, to ensure nations or individuals whose conduct is designed to distress or dishonor our country.

The unanimous expression of public sentiment, which has gone forth in the United States, on the late outrageous proceeding of the British marine, must carry conviction to every government in the world, that the American people will suffer no difference in domestic politics to divide them on questions of great national concern, and that in every occurrence of foreign aggression, they will act with the union and vigor which ought to be expected from men, who have interests of a dearer nature to defend than the members of any other community.

Placed by a gracious providence in a country, which embraces every benefit of soil and climate that can give value to existence, and in full possession of every faculty which a free government and inexhaustible resources, both of nature and art can bestow, to permit the diminution of these enjoyments by any earthly power, would impair our gratitude to heaven, & violate the first principle of nature, self-preservation.

To continue these blessings unimpaired, and to transmit the inheritance of our Fathers without a stain to posterity, or to sink them in the sordid considerations of a delusive tranquility, is now the option before us.

That the choice has been irrevocably made, is recorded in the unanimous and indignant expression of the public will. Before the pleasing task briefly to review, the means which we possess to enforce the determination should negotiation fail, and the required reparation be refused.

With a population that can furnish, with but little inconvenience, to the pursuits of agriculture, manufactures and the mechanic arts, five hundred thousand brave and hardy soldiers, with a commerce, fisheries, and coasting trade, that could yield to the purposes of war one hundred thousand of the bravest and best of seamen, with every supply that can be required for naval or military use, with the proud remembrance of triumphant constancy and courage, in the struggle of our revolution, War to annimate the exertions of future contest, and with a geographical position, which gives to our country a commanding choice of military operation; is it within the conception of reason or common sense, that any nation should wantonly and without cause, provoke the just resentment of such a people?

Could anything short of madness urge that NATION, whose best interests are interwoven with our peaceful intercourse, to such an act of desperation and self-destruction? Let the nations of Europe and more especially Great Britain resolve the question. Be it the case of our government to place the question fairly before her—and be it the unalterable decision of the American people, to meet her pacific answer with honorable reconciliation, or her war-demeanor with bold and inflexible hostility.

To the Editor of the Washington Federalist.

I WAS sorry to observe in your paper of the 1st instant, a palpable misstatement of the late outrage committed on the frigate Chesapeake, under the command of commodore James Barron—and from your generous declaration that you have no wish to injure the reputation of that officer, I am sure you will take pleasure in publishing the following remarks:

That commodore James Barron and no other person on board the Chesapeake had any reasonable ground to apprehend an attack from the Leopard, appears from the manner the captain of the Leopard hailed the Chesapeake; and from the circumstance of the ladies and children of Dr. Bullus's family, who were passengers, remaining on deck, until the first gun was fired from the Leopard, and they had only gone into the ward-room, when a broadside was given.

Secondly, at the time the Leopard came along side of the Chesapeake, the crew was employed in getting the anchor secured on the bows and coiling the cables below, one cable still remaining on deck. You also err in stating that the guns were loaded with double headed shot—they were only loaded in the customary way with round shot, as the guns of all ships are when going to sea. I can also assure you that captain James Barron has not been to Norfolk since the Chesapeake has been in commission—his place of residence being near Hampton. This fact sufficiently contradicts the report of the captain of the Melampus having told him he would have his men by fair or foul means.

That captain Barron was as anxious to defend the flag as any other officer on board, appears from his having desired his officers to repair to quarters, as soon as danger was apprehended, and to do it without an unnecessary display of hostilities, as soon as he had read the orders of the British captain, which was sent on board his ship under the appearance of a private dispatch supposed for Europe: that after giving the answer, he went on deck and endeavored to hail the Leopard, when a gun was fired at him, and a broadside followed which was near terminating his existence; notwithstanding this he made several efforts to hail the Leopard, standing in the open gangway exposed to as heavy a fire as ever was witnessed. In this situation he continued to receive their fire for the space of fifteen minutes. Finding not a gun had been or could be made ready to fire from his ship; his masts, rigging and hull cut to pieces, a shot between wind and water, and upwards of 4 feet water in the hold; he reluctantly ordered the flag to be struck, but it is totally false that he hauled it down with his own hands. I am told from good authority it was done as usual by one of the quarter master's of the after guard. Such a report could only be made by one of capt. Barron's bitter enemies, which God knows he has enough of.

There has however been a deficiency in some department of the ship. If captain Barron did order all hands to quarters before the enemy began to fire, even if it was without the usual forms; and if it was after the firing commenced, had the ship been prepared for an engagement, would she not have been able to return a gun previous to the colors being struck? There is no doubt of it; and I suspect on the trial it will appear the ship was not prepared? Why was the fire not returned? Because the priming horns and matches could not be got from the magazine, owing it is stated, to the confusion the gunner was thrown into at the first broadside; this also indicates that the magazine was not well arranged. Will any man say that was the commodore's fault? Capt. Barron did not go on board the Chesapeake, as the acting captain; he was in the capacity of the commodore, with an officer, acting as captain, under him, namely, capt. Gordon, whose rank is a master commandant. After an elapse of 15 minutes, the Leopard pouring it into the Chesapeake, two powder horns were obtained from below by captain Gordon himself, and given to lieutenant Allen, who fired a gun with a total of fire or a logger-head from the gallery, no matches being yet ready. Fifteen minutes is a long time for a ship to receive the fire of an adversary of superior force, without being in a capacity to return a gun—and no man can be deemed a coward who can stand for 15 minutes in the open gangway of a ship, exposed to as heavy a fire as can be conceived. A court of enquiry, which will be held on the spot, will determine where the blame ought to attach. It is therefore cruel that the character of a man, who once so high, should be blasted, until judgment is given against him.

A FRIEND TO JUSTICE.

FROM THE SALEM REGISTER.

A high estimate is made of the talents of General Bennisen, not only from his brave conduct at Eylau, which has procured him the notice of his Prince, but from the military talents which he has been known to cultivate, and by which he has distinguished himself. To him is attributed the work which appeared at Riga in the year 1793, in which he gives his "Thoughts upon the knowledge necessary for every officer of the Light Horse," a work of high reputation. It has been observed, that Gen. Bennisen, upon an examination of the military talents of the French emperor, pronounced that his manner of execution was the same, and that, should he ever engage with him, he should be sure to profit from the discovery. Report has attributed this remark to Gen. Bennisen, and his success has given it the same, but the anonymous author of Reflections of a Soldier upon the events of the last war, published at Cologne in 1806, appears to have thought differently at that time of the military arrangements of the French Emperor. He says, "In this second campaign, the system of war of the Emperor of the French discovered a remarkable change. Hitherto he had attacked his enemies with the rapidity of lightning, but this was the fury of an overwhelming torrent. He seemed to renounce his activity, to attain his end by more studied marches. He hazarded nothing! All his marches were manœuvres, in which he studied the grounds, and reconnoitered places, which could be the most advantageous, for all his future plans. We might thus see, that, after having examined the field of battle, upon which he had resolved to decide the fate of the coalition, he made but very small movements forward, contenting himself with a full understanding of those of the enemy, and manœuvred so well, as to draw the enemy to an attack, upon the spot of which he has fully studied all the advantages. That the Russians deceived by the retrograde movement of Napoleon, should think that they might attack with advantage, might be excusable, but why did not the Austrian general discover the advantages which might arise to the French. The fact was that some days before the battle of Austerlitz, the French emperor advanced before Brunn with his headquarters, made one or two marches, and advanced his army, but soon returned to the ground which he had already examined in the Austerlitz. The Gazette published instantly that he was in full retreat, and it was simple enough, that the Russians pushed their confidence to rashness, when they saw Napoleon do that before them which he had never done before. The event is well known. The writer observes, "If the emperor Alexander has been content to check the French till the arrival of the army of Bennisen in Bohemia, whence he might annoy the left of the French army, and might have forced himself into Pressburg, and towards the Danube, he must have embarrassed the French exceedingly. For the army of Bennisen united to that of the Archduke Ferdinand had such superiority that it must have forced its way to the Danube, and endangered Brannau, the deposit of the whole French army. While the army of Bennisen thus harassed the French on the left, the emperor Alexander and the archduke Charles might have directed their march to Vienna, and without a general action have obliged the French to quit Brunn." This knowledge Bennisen had of these arrangements. While thus informed of the talents of the emperor of the French, he will not, probably, trust to the uniformity of the military operations of Napoleon.

VULGAR ERRORS.

Extract from Dr. Arthur Browne's Sketches. When Sully or Clarendon compose history, they speak from knowledge, and record facts to them familiar; but what can be more ridiculous than a country curate or a closet philosopher narrating events to him imperfectly known, and explaining motives by him wildly conjectured, even positions the most universally received as indisputable in our own time, are by ministers and statesmen often derided as popular errors. All in England, in 1749, was frantic at the outrage offered to captain Jenkins, by the Spaniards cutting off his ears. The late lord Bute assured a friend of mine, that no such thing ever happened. All America held Mr. C. Grenville in abhorrence as the author of the stamp act; the late Mr. Burke assured me, it was a measure odious to him, and which met his total disapprobation. Yet what historian doubts to record these undisputed facts? What then shall we think of more ancient history? Is it not odd, that scarce a man at the time thinks himself acquainted with the interior of the cabinet of princes; yet after the lapse of a few years, when he is much less likely to know it from the lapse of time and death of witnesses, almost every man thinks himself perfectly acquainted with it, and fully qualified to be an historian!

WISDOM OF THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION.

(From the same.)

Few persons seem to have a true idea of the wisdom of that constitution of which Englishmen boast so much. They are perpetually scrutinizing the private vices and follies of opposition, and imputing all their actions to interest. The English constitution does not object to virtue; it rejoices in it; but its wisdom is, that it can abstract from virtue; it has provided for its absence, and depends more upon the conflicts of parties and balances of powers to produce its salutary ends. Hence it is, that for so many generations the political vessel has worked well, and though in one sense a false patriot may turn into a bad minister, his errors or his perfidy will be corrected, if not by the virtue, by the interests of the next generation. A celebrated leader of opposition in England has been often traduced by his enemies as a man of vicious character. I perhaps am too much bigotted in favor of that great man to view him with any eye but that of extrime admiration; but supposing, for a moment, that the calumnies of his enemies were true, if his advice was such as would have saved his country, the nation which rejected him as a minister seems to me to have acted much as wisely as the drowning man who should say, "I will not accept the able assisting hand of the man who extends it to me for I do not like him."

FREDERICKSBURG, July 3.

July 1st, 1807.

At a meeting of the citizens of Fredericksburg and its vicinity, convened at the Town Hall.

William Smock, (Mayor) Chairman.

James Brown from the committee appointed at the last meeting of June 27th, to prepare an address to the President of the U. States, presented the following memorial:

To the President of the United States.

The memorial of the citizens of Fredericksburg and its vicinity,

Sheweth, That British injuries, long and unremittently pursued, have filled the bosoms of your memorialists with sentiments of the strongest indignation—that, in these injuries, there has been nothing wanting of predatory outrage and national insult, to stamp them indelibly on the feelings and recollections of Americans—your memorialists are attached to peace—are warmly attached to fair and honorable peace. They have hitherto suppressed the emotions which British violence has kindled—they have warmly applauded that policy of our government which has sought redress of wrongs through amicable and rational discussion—and have anxiously marked the progress of negotiation, which, they fondly hoped, would restore to their country her rights redressed, and her name untarnished—but that negotiation has been found to be the protraction of wrongs. Instead of ill redressed, outrage has become more daring. The vessels of America have been seized and plundered—her citizens have been impressed and murdered—her ports and harbors have been infested with British force—her sovereignty and independence have been flagrantly insulted and violated. And when justice has demanded from the government of Great Britain signal punishment on the violation of her flag, and of her territory, and on the murder of an American citizen—he has been deterring from the mockery of trial with triumphant acquittal.

The late unwarrantable and unprovoked attack of a British squadron upon the U. S. frigate the Chesapeake, fills up the measure of astonishment and of patience—it strips the American flag of its honors, and if submitted to, will leave this country without a name.

Your memorialists pronounce that the present is a crisis which is to fix the American character forever. It will either terminate in the career of American glory, or will prolong it to the latest posterity. It must furnish the sad memorial of blighted honors, of withered strength, and of premature decay; or it will transmit to succeeding generations, the untarnished splendor of that name which is derived from the conquest of freedom and the achievement of the revolution.

At the present crisis but one sentiment thrills through the nation. It warms, invigorates, and connects the hearts of all in one firm, unanimous resolution to resist British violence and outrage. It renounces that hostile peace which presents the spectacle of unrelenting cruelty and warfare on the one side and of forbearance to retaliation by force on the other.

These memorialists repose a confidence in the government of their country, to which its virtuous and upright administration preeminently entitles it. They rely upon its wisdom and its firmness to adopt the most prompt and efficient measures to rescue their country's honor from disgrace, and to secure her rights from violation. In the pursuit of such measures they pledge the government their warmest support, and in their firm resolve do devote their fortunes and their lives to the preservation of the rights and the dignity of their nation.

These memorialists beg leave to offer their best wishes for the happiness and prosperity of the president of the U. S. and to tender him their friendship and high esteem.

Which memorial being read, was unanimously agreed to. And it was thereupon ordered, that the same be signed by the chairman of the meeting and transmitted, in the behalf of the citizens of Fredericksburg and its vicinity, to the President of the United States.

On motion, ordered, That David C. Ker, John W. Green, Robert Standard, and John Taylor Lomax, be of correspondence to committees of Norfolk places.

Whereupon the meeting adjourned.

A Report of the Trial of Thomas Oliver Selfridge, Esq.
On an indictment for Manslaughter, for killing Mr. Charles Austin, on the Public Exchange, in Boston Aug. 4, 1806
THE lively interest which this extraordinary occurrence had excited in the public mind, called for a full and impartial statement of facts, both in the development of the testimony, and the pleadings which took place at the trial. This injunction appears to have been fulfilled in the present publication, as it comes from the press, sanctioned by the official reporter of the state, and under the supervision of the court itself. The public are therefore presented with all the documents necessary to form a correct understanding of the subject as well in relation to the unhappy catastrophe, as to the course and operation of the laws, in cases of this nature.
At the same place may be had,
A Correct Statement of the whole Preliminary Controversy, between Thomas Oliver Selfridge, and Benjamin Austin, (father of the deceased C. Austin.)
By Thomas Oliver Selfridge.
When he doth take the means whereby I live,
This pamphlet embraces a variety of matter, immediately relevant to the unhappy occurrence, which deprived Mr. Charles Austin of life; in which the author, in vindicating his conduct in this extraordinary affair, is drawn into a retrospection of the general character of Benjamin Austin. In adopting this mode, Mr. Selfridge has given loose to a boldness of asperity, seldom found in the writings of our best authors, and which reflect great credit on his genius and learning.
